Introducing People

A: Honestly, I'm a little nervous about meeting the new manager.
B: Really? Don't worry about it. She's really nice.
A: Thanks.
B: Here she comes now. Hello Ms. Carmichael.
C: Hello Patrick. It's good to see you again.
B: You too. Ms. Carmichael I want to introduce you to Megan Sato, our Sales Rep from Tokyo.
A: Hello Ms. Carmichael. It's good to meet you.
C: It's good to meet you too Ms. Sato. Can I call you Megan?
A: Of course.
C: Great. Please, call me Amanda.
A: That sounds great.

A: Oh my god. I'm so nervous to meet your mom.
B: Really? Don't worry about it. She's really relaxed. She loves meeting people. She'll probably tell you all about her crafts.
A: Thanks. Her crafts?
B: Here she comes now. Hi Mom!
C: Hi Patty. It's good to see you again. And who's this?
B: Mom, this is Steve. Steve, Mom.
A: Hello Mrs. Stevens. It's good to meet you.
C: You too Steven. But please, call me Barbara.
A: Sounds good.
C: So, Steven, did Patty tell you I'm an artist?
A: Yeah. She said you like making crafts, right?
C: That's right! Let me tell you all about it.

About the sheet:

There's really not a lot of content on the first page. I would use this sheet only as necessary. The language itself is pretty straightforward and can be used for a specific, directed role play or with business people who need the language frequently. From my own experience it hardly ever comes up though. I originally used full names here but changed it to X and Y simply for space reasons. Also, if you've ever seen Arrested Development you'll probably know why I take a certain amount of delight in the name, Mr. X.

The second page is perhaps the most useful. The conversations show similar language being used in a formal but friendly business meeting and a nervous boyfriend meeting his girlfriend's mom for the first time in the second.
